A LINK AT LAST
THIS IS WHAT I HAVE BELIEVED ALL ALONG

Bronze Age find is evidence of early sea trade routes

ANCIENT bronze has been found on the seabed off the Westcountry coast, which could provide fascinating evidence about age-old trade links.

The bronze, of a type otherwise known only in Italy, was discovered off the coast of Salcombe, South Devon, as one of 28 Bronze Age items found in the area.

British Archaeology, which features the find in its November to December issue, said: "The Sicilian object from Salcombe is the first secure object of Mediterranean origin and bronze age date to be found in north-west Europe.

"The presence of this material on England's south coast would appear to be tangible evidence of cross-channel connections.

"It is also appreciated by bronze age researchers that interlocking maritime networks extended all along the Atlantic seaboard of Europe and linked in to others traversing the Mediterranean."

The article in British Archaeology was written by David Parham, from Bournemouth University; Stuart Needham, from the British Museum; and Michael Palmer, licensee of the South West Maritime Archaeological Group.

They say the Sicilian bronze was the cargo of a single boat that crossed the channel, indicating "at the very least" cross-channel trade.
